作者简介

JACK LONDON (1876-1916) was raised in the San Francisco Bay area. His love of reading fed his imagination, but it was his thirst for adventure that took him around the country. In his teens, London left school and became a seaman. He was an oyster pirate and a deep-sea sailor before returning to land, riding freight trains around the country as a hobo. Self-educated and headstrong, Jack returned to Oakland and entered the University of California at Berkeley, determined to become a writer. He spent the winter of 1897 in Canada and Alaska, a trip that provided inspiration for his novel The Call of the Wild.
