章节摘录

版权页：插图：Consumers for nursing services have become an increasingly effective force in changing nursing practice. On the whole, people have become better educated and have more knowledge about health and illness than in the past. This is in no small measure because of television and the news media. Consumers also have become more aware of the needs of others for care. The ethical and moral issues raised by poverty and neglect have caused people to be more vocal about the needs of minority groups and the poor. The public's concepts of health and nursing have also changed. People now believe that health is a right of all people, not just a privilege of the rich. People are bombarded by the media with the message that individuals must assume responsibility for their own health by obtaining a physical examination regularly, checking for the seven danger signals of cancer, and maintaining their mental well-being by balancing work and recreation. Interest in health and nursing services is therefore greater than ever. Furthermore, many people now want more than freedom from disease—they want energy, vitality, and a feeling of wellness. Increasingly, the consumer has become an active participant in making decisions about health and nursing care. Planning committees concerned with providing nursing services to a community have active consumer membership. More and more state and provincial nursing associations have representatives of the community on their governing boards.
