章节摘录

Helen could not decide which of the boys she likes best. Both of them were old friends of hers, and they both had nice personalities. Rob was more similar to her, perhaps. He had the same interests as her, and they enjoy doing things together. She was a bit older than him, but that was not very important. He was very kind and responsible, and much more self-confident than John. She was very fond of him, and she knew that he loved her. Only she was not sure whether he loved her as much as John. John was very different from her - he was not really like anybody else she had ever met—and that made him more interesting, in a way. He had traveled more than her, and he could talk for hours about places that she had never seen. He was better-looking than Rob, too - taller and stronger. And his eyes were the same colour as the sea on a summer day. But John was strange. She never quite knew what he was thinking, and he sometimes did unexpected things that worried her.
