章节摘录

Nevertheless, sales do offer a special opportunity for sharp practices and shoppers need to be extra critical. For example, the "second" should be clearly marked as such and not sold as if they were perfect. The term "substandard", incidentally, usually indicates a more serious defect than "seconds". More serious is the habit of marking the price down from an alleged previous price which is in fact fictitious. Mis-description of this and all other kinds is much practiced by the men who run one-day sales of carpets in church halls and the like. As the sellers leave the district the day after the sale there is little possibility of redress. In advertising sales, shops may say "only 100 left" when in fact they have plenty more : conversely they may say "10,000 at half-price" when only a few are available at such a drastic reduction. If ever the warning "let the buyer beware" were necessary it is during sales.
