章节摘录

版权页：Warman's, the makers of office materials, had advertised for a travelling salesman. Mr. Barlow applied for the job, and soon afterwards was invited to the company's head office to meet Mr. Snell, the sales manager. Mr. Snell asked Mr. Barlow what experience he had had as a salesman. "I worked as a salesman for a brush company until six months ago. I sold brushes, dusters, tins of polish, things like that. I went from door to door selling direct to housewives. "Mr. Snell then asked him why he had left that job. "Well, to be honest, it was very hard work," Mr. Barlow replied. "It meant walking sometimes six or eight miles a day. But the real reason for leaving was that I didn't think very highly of the goods that I was selling. They were not of the best quality, and that made it difficult for me to be sincere when I had to tell housewives what wonderful brushes they were. I knew perfectly well they wouldn't last beyond a month. What's more, the pay was rather poor. I realized after a while that I wouldn't be able to support a family on the money I was earning. "I see," said Mr. Snell. "So what did you do next ? " "For the last six months I have been a salesman in a department store," said Mr. Barlow. "And do you think you could sell Warman's office materials with clear conscience ? " Mr. Snell asked. "Do you think you could be sincere, as you put it, about selling the papers, inks, copying-machines and so on that we produce here ? " Mr. Barlow said that he thought he could; that Warman's office materials enjoyed a very high reputation, and that in his department at Caldwell's he sold almost nothing else. He said he had always wanted to work for a big company with a good name ; to travel all over the country, selling goods to other companies, rather than to housewives on doorstep; and——he added with a smile——to enjoy the money and the working conditions offered with the job for which he had applied.
