章节摘录

版权页：插图： According to him, the problem lay not in allowing the UN inspectors more time, but in how much more the Security Council would tolerate Iraq. In the light of Iraq's invasion of other countries in the past, its attempt to control the whole of the Middle East, and its determination to keep and develop WMD, the United States would not and could not let Saddam Hussein keep and use WMD at the risk of world security. Mr. Powell finally said that Resolution 1441 had given Iraq one last chance. However, the inspections of the last two months had proven that Iraq had no intention of seizing this chance, but continued to breach its obligations under the Security Council resolutions. In this situation, the Security Council must not shrink from its responsibilities. Mr. Powell's statement actually kicked off a new round of diplomatic initiatives and media support for America's eventual declaration of war on Iraq. The United States did indeed present new things at this meeting, and to some extent, these gave the impression that Iraq was holding and concealing WMD. However, later facts proved that the so-called information and evidence were faulty, and Mr. Powell's presentation at the Security Council became his Waterloo. In September 2005, retired Secretary of State Colin Powell publicly admitted, in an interview given to American ABC TV, that his presentation at the Security Council was inaccurate. Describing it as "a blot" on his record, he said, "It's painful for me." After Powell's presentation, foreign ministers from other participating nations began to deliver speeches. The order of speaking had been decided by drawing lots, and I was the first to speak. I made five points in my speech. First, I noted that foreign ministers from a majority of the Security Council member states were present, which indicated that all parties valued the authority and function of the Security Council and supported the political settlement of the Iraq issue under the UN framework.
