前言

English names are used in the English-speaking world: the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and many other regions. With the ever-increasing popularity and prevalence of English language around the world, English names, mainly first names, are also adopted in non-English-speaking countries like China. While selecting preferential English names, Chinese people often make use of homophones, which sound like their given names in Chinese though differ in meanings to a considerable extent in most cases. If we know some etymological, especially the semantically implied aspects of the target names, we may get our desirable English names as expected. With admirable names, we are likely to be treated as we wish to, especially when our names serve as our symbolic identity without our physical presence in various circumstances.
