Historical Analysis of State-owned Retailers and Foreign Retailers' Strategic Integration The historical analysis of this article is based on time series analysis, dating from the reform and openness in China in 1978. Four stages are used to analyze the dynamic competitive behaviors Of different types of enterprises according to the change of government's policies about investment and operation of foreign enterprises in China (Long, 2001). 2.1 The First Stage: The Prohibited Entry Stage (1978-1991) At this stage, the Chinese Government completely prohibited foreign retailers from operating any wholly-owned or joint ventures dealing with retail and wholesale business. Native retailers in Guangzhou successfully avoided direct competition against foreign retailers. They took advantages of policies to promote the development of Guangzhou retailing. Not only did the native retailers begin to build the commercial network layouts which contributed to the establishment of professional markets of a certain scale, they also started institutional reform. Even if foreign retailers such as Carrefour and Metro AG had already begun doing transnational business at this time (Huang & Sternquist, 2007), they were still prohibited from setting up stores by market entry policies. Scot (1995) argues that legal regulations in the home and host country represent the strongest environmental pressures faced by organizations. Therefore, only by capital penetration using policy loopholes could the foreign retailers enter the Guangzhou retail market, which part of capital, however, still had only a tiny influence on the whole retail business in Guangzhou. All in all, at this stage, state-owned retailers began to build their commercial network while foreign retailers grew as a threat to state-owned retailers.
