章节摘录

2-1-8 Etymological Twins in English In the course of the development of the English vocabulary we may find that there are a few pairs of words which came from the same language source. At the beginning of the formation of words they were similar not only in form but also in meaning. As time went by their senses became divergent, especially today. According to the linguistic phenomenon we call these pairs of words etymological twins or etymological variants in English. Let us take six pairs of words for example. human and humane: The word human used as an adjective in the 14th century was derived from the Middle French word humain, also from the Latin word h~m~nus. The meaning is of or belonging to man, and the stress is on the first syllable. Now it has two meanings: one is of or characteristic of man; the other is having or showing the better qualities of man; kind; good. The word humane was also used as an adjective in the 15th century. At that time the word meant of or belonging to man. Later, in the 18th century, the word meant kind, merciful. The stress is on the second syllable. Now it has two meanings: one is having or showing sympathy, kindness and understanding, the other is (of areas of learning) tending to civilize. urban and urbane: The word urban used as an adjective came from the Latin word urbanus in 1619. The meaning is of or pertaining to a city or city life, and the This part is chiefly based on Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. New York: Chambers Harrap Publishers Ltd., 2011 and Webster's Word Histories. Springfield, MA: Merriam-Webster. The present meanings of the examples given are quoted from Oxford Advanced Learners English-Chinese Dictionary (Extended Fourth Edition). Beijing: The Commercial Press and Oxford University Press, 2002.
