章节摘录

Shortly after the opening of port in Shanghai , con- cessions began a rapid expansion , so that there were an increasing number of foreign residents. They built many simple Western-styled houses. At the same time , peasant uprisings gained intrusion into the Shanghai , Jiangsu and Zhejiang areas , and as a result , business owners , country squires and peasant workers rushed into the relative safety of the British Settlement and French concession. The overcrowding situation demanded the city houses to cover less land and have larger capacities , thus giving birth to the first wave of property development in Shanghai. Foreign businessmen leased land for the construction of a large number of wood houses. In the early 20th century , Shanghais residential houses "changed looks" again , and gradually transformed from the cottage-style single-family courtyard to rows of connected high-density buildings. By the 1930s , shikumen , new lane houses and apartment buildings were the principal residences of the Shanghai people and company employees , while the rich businessmen and high-ranking officials built their private mansions in the sparsely populated western suburbs of Shanghai.
