章节摘录

To these , the teachers we surveyed add-ed : inadequate and unsupervised school-based experiences , poor quality of many teacher candidates (i) , and university faculty inexperienced in the schools. When teachers talk about teacher education , their opinions are grounded in practice. They value ideas that translate directly into a better lesson for the class and reforms that make it more likely for children to learn. Research-based theory , the preoccupation of many schools of education , is largely irrelevant to teachers , who must deal with 20 to 35 students five or six hours a day. The survey responses come at a time when teacher education practices and policies are in great flux , with reformers tackling different aspects of teacher education. The frustrations and irritations teachers express arise , to great degree , from their belief that schools of education should be committed to preparing teacher candidates for the practice of teaching. Teacher educators , on the other hand , see their purpose as the study of pedagogy : developing theories of teaching and learning in a rarefied world remote from the day-to-day realities of a K-12 classroom.
