章节摘录

The Internet is developing at a surprising speed and is changing the whole way of ur lifeand education. For example, it is claimed that children can just study at home, making full use of abundant information on the Internet, instead of going to schools as they did before. There is no denying that the Internet plays an important role in the domain of education but, as far as I am concerned, it is far from enough to ensure an education as comprehensive and whole some as schools do. Admittedly, the Internet is doomed to play an inevitable role in children & rsquo; S education. If a student cannot explore the virtual world by using IE or Firefox, etc., he or she will be in dan-ger of being kept from what iS going on in the world. However, those students who know howto search for the valuable information available on the Web tend to gain themselves big advan.rages in that they can browse for more detailed information about the subjects discussed inclass, gaining a deeper insight into the events or experiments and acquiring a multi-dimensional understanding of the current issues, since SO great a variety of related information can be ac-cessed by some powerful search engines such as G ogle , or Baidu. However , this does not au-tomatically mean the Internet can play a11 the roles a school can , nor that it can take the placeof school education. School education always is , and will remain , essential for children & rsquo; Supbringing , because it is not only a platform to impart knowledge but also a stage to educate an individual about val-ues and attitudes , rights and wrongs , goods and evils. At school , children , encouraged by their peers , can benefit in a wider range. They are more likely to be sociable and outgoing , cooperative and tolerant. On the other hand.

the Internet can hardly serve these functions. Even if it provides information about role samples and about moral classes , it is not up to chil-dren to choose from these & Idquo; goods & rsquo; & rsquo; and those unsuitable & Idquo; evils & rdquo; online. for children are not ma-ture enough to make a good judgment and their parents are always busy working and absent from home. & hellip; & hellip;
