章节摘录

版权页：插图： Carr wrote The Twenty Years' Crisis not to articulate a theory of realism, but instead to criticize British (and American) intellectuals for largely ignoring the role of power in international politics. He has made this point clear in the preface to the second edition: " The Twenty Years' Crisis was written with the deliberate aim of counteracting the glaring and dangerous defect of nearly all thinking, both academic and popular, about international politics in English-speaking countries from 1919 to 1939-almost the total neglect of power". For Carr, idealists held a hopelessly idealistic view of international politics, because they were determined to radically transform world politics and create a peaceful international order where statesmen cared about not the balance of power but morality, harmony of interests, international law, international organization and world government. The idealists seldom cared about the objective reality and even saw themselves as the key agents for accomplishing the idealistic task. Based on the critique of idealism, Carr forcefully made the case that power is an essential ingredient in politics and international politics are always power politics. Morality is relative and it is the product of power. Carr submitted that power has three key elements: the military component, the economic component and the power over opinion. The three categories of political power are closely interdependent, and further is difficult to imagine any state possessing one but not another for any length of time. Carr places great emphasis on the military elements of power in international politics, for " the ultimate ratio of power in international politics is war". The foreign policy of a state is limited by its military strength. Carr notes links between the economic and military elements of power but argues that it is separable. For Carr, power determines morality, any international moral order must rest on some hegemony of power. Thus, great powers can formulate rules according to their own interests and standards and then spread them taking advantage of power. Meanwhile, great powers should seek a compromise and exchange interests with other states or disclaim part of vested interests to make other states in the international system accept them. In short, power has a decisive role in international politics, but morality must rest on some hegemony of power to find a foothold, thus it will be useful to stabilize international order.
