章节摘录

While these three approaches better reflect the types of academic competencies that most language educators value and wish to promote, a learning-oriented approach to assessment maintains a clear and unambiguous focus on assessment for the purpose of fostering further learning relevant to some domain of interest (e.g., grammatical ability). Learning is defined here as the accumulation of knowledge and the ability to use this knowledge for some purpose (i.e., skill). To highlight the learning mandate in the assessment of grammar in classroom contexts, I will use the term learning-oriented assessment of grammar. Unlike the other approaches, learning-oriented assessment of grammar draws on both a theory of grammar testing (as described in Chapters 3 and 4) and a theory of second language learning (i.e., grammar processing as described by Van Patten, 1996, and Lee and Van Patten, 2003, in Chapter 2). It is concerned not only with issues of grammar testing and measurement, but also with issues of instructed learning. For this reason, learning-oriented assessment of grammar aims to provide information about the grammar that students know, understand, or can use in certain contexts, and the implications that this information might have for grammar processing. Finally, moving beyond grammar performance per se, learning-oriented assessment can also provide teachers with information about what students feel or believe about learning grammar and about themselves as learners of grammar - other aspects of the instructional variable. In terms of method, learning-oriented assessment of grammar reflects the belief that assessments must remain open to all task types if the mandate is to provide information about student performance on the one hand, and information about the processing of grammatical input and the production of grammatical output on the other. Therefore, unlike with other approaches, operationalization involves the use of selected-response, limited-production and complex, extended-production tasks that may or may not invoke real-life applications or interaction. Just as in large-scale assessments, though, the specification of test tasks varies according to the specific purpose of the assessment and the claims we would like to make about what learners know and can do, and in fact, in some instances, a multiple-choice task may be the most appropriate task type available. Finally, learning-oriented assessment is designed to be an integral part of instruction, occurring formally or informally at any stage of the learning process. ....
