章节摘录

( Except in a panic disorder , when the response is very immediate and severe ) .Anxiety alerts US to a problem , and motivates US to try to resolve the problem , because we want the anxiety to go away.If we never felt anxious about anything , we would have little motivation to respond to problems , until we were faced with a genuine crisis.Normal anxiety is not a sign of a psychological disturbance , because we all experience it , and it helps US manage our lives by alerting US to problems requiring a response.Anxiety disorders develop when we experience severe anxiety in response to minor or common problems , or when the anxiety never goes away, and actually interferes with our problem solving. Anxiety problems are very common.In fact , in the United States , more people visit their physician for anxiety than for coughs and colds.The prevalence of anxiety disorders varies by type, ranging from 1% of the population for some disorders , to as high as 58% of combat veterans experiencing post traumatic ( 创伤的 ) stress to some degree.The use of medications for anxiety management is very common , but not effective without psychotherapy ( 心理疗法 ) .
