章节摘录

There are four main types for the formation of Chinese characters :pictographic, self-explanatory, ideographic, and pictophonetic. Pictographic formation is the earliest means by which the ancient characters are created out of the physical form and property of the things they stand for. They mainly denote common things and concrete entities in everyday life. As they have evolved gradually, they have all changed their original forms and are eventually fixed as square characters. Self-explanatory formation uses symbols only (e. g. "one", "above", and "below") or symbols coupled with some deictic labels (e. g. "root", "blade", and "blood") to designate meaning. The former might have been employed simultaneously with pictographic formation while the latter should have occurred thereafter to refer to more abstract meanings. Apparently, self-explanatory formation can be used only in a limited way. Consequently, only a limited proportion of Chinese Characters are self-explanatory, and a tiny number of symbol-only characters are identified in the Chinese writing system. Ideographic formation incorporates two or more extant character symbols into composite characters to designate a new meaning. The ancient scholars classified the Chinese characters into wen (single element characters) and zi (composite characters) . The pictographic and the self-explanatory characters are mainly composed of single elements, thus falling into the wen category. The ideographic characters are respectively composed of two or more characters, thus falling into the zi category . Different symbols or pictographic characters plus some deictic labels are combined to designate a new abstract meaning in the ideographic formation. For instance, (bright) was written as , whose meaning is a composition of (the sun) and (the moon) . Pictophonetic formation covers those characters that are made up of two elements: the meaning element and the sound element. This formation is highly effective in creating new characters to stand for a new thing or concept..

More barriers between Chinese and Western lexicography are thUS likely to be removed , and new forms of comparative and interactive research in a more global context will become a real possibility ” (R.R.K.Hartmann , Foreword) .
