章节摘录

You are facing a dilemma (进退两难, 困境) shared by many workers trying to advance career in management: You need managerial experience to get a job, but can't seem to get that experience because no one will hire you. No one automatically becomes a manager. Somewhere down the road, most managers are able to go beyond the experience gap. The typical ways are through education (being trained for management academically or within an organization) and promotion (filling a departing supervisor's shoes after proving yourself as an employee). And sometimes even an outside applicant without the experience will secure a management job based on their apparent potential or who they know. It sounds as though you're on the way to accumulating the experience necessary to achieve your goals. However, you aren't quite there yet. And it seems to me that you are overreaching a bit with the types of jobs you have been applying to. Perhaps, you'd like to be in charge of a 30-person staff. Given this situation, you will need a few more years of experience as a junior manager. As the head of a library, my guess is that you'll need a great deal of experience not only managing people, but also budgets, facilities and outer relationships. At this point, your first priority should be to get back into a job supervising people—even one person is better than none. Pick a job within a larger library organization, where you'll have room to grow professionally. As part of your interview process, be sure to ask direct questions regarding your opportunities for advancement and don't be afraid to share some of your ambitions. And remember not to ignore your two years managerial experience. Having six direct reports whether part-time or full-time is a respectable number. Before applying to positions, make a list of your achievements and strengths as a supervisor. This should better help you reflect those features in a confident manner.
