章节摘录

Such a question in English functions as a genuine request for information rather than as a greeting . That is to say . if someone asks their colleague or friend whether they have had lunch or not , the person wants to know “ yes ” or “ no ” . If the reply is negative the person will probably go on to suggest that they go and have lunch together . In other words , this kind of question is often a lead-in to a suggestion or invitation . Between unmarried young people it can also indicate the young man ' S interest in dating the girl . It cannot be used simply to greet a person , as is normal in Chinese . Another common way of greeting in Chinese is to ask “ Where are you going ? ” This question does not really ask for information , but merely acts as a greeting . However , in English such a question is normally a request for information . Such details are regarded as a personal matter , SO this question can typically only be used by someone in authority or between very close friends . If it is used in other contexts , it may cause embarrassment . If they do not reply , it ' S rude ; and if they give a vague answer , they seem to be avoiding the question . Yet they might not wish to reply honestly . For these reasons , Westerners may easily be offended at such a Chinese form of greeting and feel that it is an invasion of their privacy . Another common way of greeting in Chinese is to state what somebody is doing . If you meet someone who is obviously going to the dining hall you may make a comment like “ going to dinner ” or if you see someone cleaning their bike , you say “ cleaning your bike ” . Often in English this sounds a little strange because the comment seems to state the obvious . In such a situation , it is possible to simply greet the person with a common greeting like “ Hello ” .
