章节摘录

Palo Alto-based Facebook , which was founded in 2004 and has more than 500 million users , filed its trademark infringement lawsuit in U. S. District Court in San Jose last week , asserting that the "book" part of its name is "highly distinctive in the context of online communities and networking websites". "If others could freely use ' generic plus book' marks for online networking services targeted to that particular generic category of individuals , the suffix ' book' could become a generic term for ' online community/networking services ".

"As companies mature , it becomes common that they start bringing trademark enforcement actions against people with names that bug them. " Facebook believes that Teachbook is unfairly riding on its coattails by using the suffix "book" to reference the larger site' s established reputation. "Effectively they' re bombing a mosquito here , and we' re not sure why they want to do that. " Teachbook said. 2. A Delaware Chancery Court judge has ruled in favor of eBay in a shareholder suit against Craigslist and its majority shareholders . In 2004 , eBay paid $32 million for a 28.4 percent interest in San Francisco-based Craigslist , with founder Newmark and CEO Buckmaster getting $8 million each. But relations broke down after eBay launched a rival classifieds business in 2007. In January 2008 , controlling stakeholders Newmark and Buckmaster adopted a rights plan that diluted eBay' s stake in the company , and a legal battle quickly ensued. eBay and Craigslist both filed lawsuits against each other , with eBay claiming Craigslist had tried to unfairly dilute its stake , and Craigslist alleging that eBay had used it to develop its own competing classified service. "We are very pleased that the court gave eBay what it sought from the lawsuit , " eBay General Counsel said in a press release. "eBay brought this suit to protect its own shareholders and preserve its valuable investment in Craigslist. "
