内容概要

American architecture generally conjures up great names like Frank Lloyd Wright, Robert Venturi, Richard Meier, and Peter Eisenman. The young contemporary architecture scene in the United States tends to be less well known. With small yet ambitious projects, these young architects demonstrate their inspired handling of the influences of different schools and regions and the traditions of other cultures. This book presents the most important representatives of the new generation of architects and- in an introductory essay- examines what contribution the United States has to make to international developments in architecture today.
